I walk in London
Among immense, impossible spirals of glass, and fantastic, slanting protrusions of office-bearing stone Impressive testaments to the cities ingenuity, modernity –Or, rather, its wealth

Magnificent, ostentatious temples like those of Ancient Greeks or Egyptians before

Power symbols of the rich constructed of the misery of the poor

When will we learn to wear simple clothes?

When will we measure the strength of a society
Not by the grandeur of its elements
But by the scarcity of its pain?

In thinking of future cities
We must let our imaginations pan down from the flying cars and floating gardens of tomorrow's magnificent skyline To the darkest, most neglected part of town – Is it safe there?